The Cold War Paranoid: Hunting Soviet Spies

As the Cold War escalated, Angleton became increasingly consumed by the fear of Soviet espionage within the CIA. He believed that the Agency had been penetrated by a mole, a double agent working for the Soviet Union. This paranoia led him to launch a relentless and controversial campaign to root out the alleged infiltrator, a quest that would ultimately consume his career.

Angleton employed unconventional and often ruthless methods in his pursuit of Soviet spies. He subjected suspected moles to intense interrogations and polygraph tests, creating an atmosphere of fear and mistrust within the CIA. His paranoia reached its peak during the "Lavender Scare" of the 1950s, when he initiated a purge of homosexuals from the Agency, believing that they were vulnerable to blackmail by Soviet intelligence.

Questioning the Warren Commission: The JFK Assassination

In the aftermath of President John F. Kennedy's assassination in 1963, Angleton's suspicions turned towards Lee Harvey Oswald, the alleged lone gunman. He questioned the official findings of the Warren Commission, believing that Oswald had been part of a larger conspiracy involving the Soviet Union or Cuban intelligence. Angleton's relentless pursuit of alternative theories further fueled his reputation as an enigmatic and controversial figure.

Isolation and the End of an Era

As the Cold War waned, Angleton's star within the CIA began to wane. His obsession with Soviet espionage had alienated many of his colleagues, who believed that he had become unhinged and paranoid. In 1975, he was forced to resign from his position as Counterintelligence Chief, marking the end of an era in CIA history.

James Jesus Angleton spent his remaining years in relative obscurity, continuing to write and lecture on intelligence and espionage. He died in 1987, leaving behind a legacy of controversy and intrigue that continues to fascinate and inspire.
